Two days later the gentleman and his servants were quartered in Paris. sometimes Smiler had to put him to bed. He got up anywhere between 10 o'clock and noon. Sometimes he breakfasted heartily; at other times he merely sipped his coffee. Smiler was sent to buy tickets for every fashionable event, from the opera to the races, and he always came and departed in a private carriage, quite an elegant equipage. About this time the Parisian newspapers were agitating the matter of the remarkable tests in spiritualism given before eminent gentlemen by a peasant woman in Milan. The psychological society was in session in the French capital and the comments on the feats performed in Italy were made more interesting by the presence of a renowned English mind reader. This gentleman showed great aptitude in ferreting out criminals, and his accuracy in this respect made him feared by the wrong doers. One morning, when the gentleman was

Smiler: "Markham, the mind reader, has run down another criminal, Smiler. What do you think of that?"

"If I might venture an opinion, sir,

I should say that it was all bosh." "All bosh, ch? May I ask why?" "Well, sir, it stands to reason, sir, that no man can tell what is going on in another's mind. It's against nature, and what's against nature can't be gentleman. done, sir. My idea is, sir, that this man, this fraud, I will call him, sir, is in collusion with these fellows, and pays 'em. ful, honest fellow, who always served his master's interests."

"It wouldn't take no mind reader to tell you that, sir."

"But wouldn't it take a mind reader to tell, Smiler, what you've got in your pocketbook?" Smiler turned pale.

"As an amateur, Smiler, mind I fon't pretend to be accurate; I should say that if any one should look in that pocketbook he would find my ruby scarf-pin and my emerald and diamond ring."

Smiler nearly went into a fit. "Of course, I have so many rings and pins that unless I was a mindreader I would never have missed these. And, let me see, Smiler, in don dailies. At 10 your trunk you have three pairs of o'clock the same my trousers. Those would not be morning, a short, thickset man, with sasily missed, either. Also about fifty

"If I were to read your mind a little further as an amateur I would tell you that on the 20th day of September you went to a pawnshop on the "He is," responded the girl, with Rue du Rivoli and there disposed of two seal rings and a watch for which you received 500 francs. They cheated you, Smiler. You should have got double that amount. From there you est, frugal fellow that you are, and opened up an account. On the 23d of rather pawned sundry articles in four 1,500 frames in the bank and twenty francs in your pocketbook, together with other articles of mine which you were about to get rid of this morning. You have been quite thrifty, and inside of a month it was your intention to draw out your money and emigrate to America, where you are desirous of setting up in trade. This has been your dream, Smiler, the life of the honest and prosperous tradesman, Am I right, Smiler? If I have made: any mistakes attribute it to the fact that I am but an amateur."

But Smiler was speechless.

"To continue, or rather to go back into the past, I read that you rebbed all your masters before me, only they were not mind readers in an amateur way and attributed the loss of different things to natural shrinkage. When you first entered my apartments in King's road your thoughts were regarding my worldly possessions. You saw much that made you sure I was a The former had rented a magnificent- man of means. After I entered the ly furnished house in a fashionable room I was seemingly busy reading part of the city. Try as he would, Smiler could learn little reading you. I did not want to see Kansas City St. Joseph of his new master. He came shows the second street of the second stree you. You interested me at once, for I recognized in you a thief of many years' training, [a thief who had pilfered for all his life and never been detected. Here, I thought, is a subject worthy of my attention, here is a case which will edify and amuse me. So I took you to my bosom, Smiler, and employed you on the spot. As you stood there waiting for me to address you the thoughts fiashed through your mind: 'I can easily get away with one of those Dresden-ware vases. He has so many of them that he never will miss it. Then he must be a careless sort of a swell, one of those spendthrifts. He will come home inebriated every night. If a pin, a ring, a watch or some other article disappears he will think he lost it somewhere the night before. He's a swell that pays no attention to his personal effects. All he thinks of is having a jolly good time.' Am I right, Smiler?" But Smiler never relapsed from his collapsed condition.

"You began to pilfer when you purchased the tickets to France. You made ten shillings on the tlekets. You put aside for yourself five abillings from the purchases from the trunkmaker. Do not deny it, for it is written indelibly on your mind. I took to you right away. 'Here is a precious rascal, I thought. 'Here la a servant worth having.' You remember I commended you for your faithfulness. And now, Smiler, do you believe in mind-reading? By the way, where are those pawn tickets, and kindly hand me your bank book." Smiler obeyed without a word. The languid gentleman went to the door and ushered in two officers.

"You corroborate all I have said," remarked the gentleman, with mild interest "Yes, yes, I confess. Don't put me

"The great English mind-reader?" "I am he. I advertised not for a valet, but for a subject. I wanted to prove some of my theories to the sogiety of savants here. You have cept by detectives, and they make an proved a very good subject. I shall write out the results of my investigations to-night and then if you care to have the law deal leniently with you you will sign it.
